Towards a better understanding of the impact of COVID-19 on the youth sector

The Partnership between the European Commission and the Council of Europe in the field of youth is coordinating a research project "Towards a better understanding of COVID-19 impact on the youth sector", which involves, inter alia:

Conducting a questionnaire for data gathering from the networks of European Knowledge Centre on Youth Policy (EKCYP) and the Pool of European Youth Researchers (PEYR) correspondents with a view to compiling and assessing data on the impact of COVID-19 on the youth sector - and in particular its impact on initiatives related to youth policy, youth work and supports for youth organisations - at national, regional and local level and sharing the resulting data, assessment and findings.

Given the present uncertainties with regard to the pandemic, EKCYP and PEYR correspondents are kindly asked, in light of their experience and expertise in the youth field in their respective countries, to give an informed and considered view, in responding to the questions, on how COVID-19 and the lockdown has impacted on and been responded to by the youth sector over the past six months. The aim is to get a snapshot in time of how young people in different countries across Europe have been impacted by COVID-19 and the lockdown and how the youth sector has responded in reaching out to, communicating with and informing young people and developing new and innovative approaches, particularly through youth inclusion and participation, digitalization, and youth work practice, to support them in this time of crisis.

Covid-19 impact on young people and on the youth sector

A reference page to research and knowledge development on the issue

The covid-19 pandemic and related lockdown measures have produced significant interruptions in young people's lives, the impact of which is still to be analysed and understood in the future.

One youth research approach to developments in young people's lives is to look at transitions to adulthood and autonomy. For example, when growing up, young people transition to education, to employment, towards economic and financial independence, or to establishing their own family, to getting the right to vote...

Covid-19 has put into question all these transitions. While on the one hand, there is an attempt to identify the best ways to deal with the crisis, and document these practices, there is also an understanding that we are entering not a short period but a longer era of new normality that young people will have to cope with.

This new extended transition is also impacting the youth field actors, including policy-makers, practitioners, youth organisations and platforms for young people's participation but also youth researchers. While there is a clear emergence of the digital youth work and increasing use of digital tools in working with young people within both formal and non-formal education across Europe, there is also an understanding that there are needs of young people that have not been responded to, leaving many to face on their own issues related to social exclusion, discrimination and a redefinition of social and safety nets. There are also questions about changing relationships and behaviour, changing perspectives on connection to friends and community, impact on well-being and mental health, employment, participation, activism, youth organisations and many other areas of young people's lives.

Young people and government representatives working together to mitigate COVID-19 effects

Mitigating the negative effects of the current COVID-19 crisis on the rights of young people, youth civil society, youth policy and youth work has been the focus of our work since the start of the pandemic in Europe.

Together with our partners, including the governmental and non-governmental representatives of our co-managed decision-making system, we are drawing the attention of our member states to the need to continue to guarantee the protection of young people's fundamental and human rights and uphold the Council of Europe's values.
